MORE SUBWAYS LATER ON.

But that was only a starter. The pres-t scheme, as projected, does away with the objectionable features of the orig-of the rapid-transit problem. It doesn't to far enough. The promoters themselves admit that.

But they are wise enough to know that if they ask for too much they won't get anything, so they are willing to take naif a loaf now and wait for the rest. Ultimately, the plan will be extended until the business district of Boston will be honeycombed with subways, and people will swarm from holes in the ground as anis from an ant-hill.

Mr. Upham and his friends carefully outlined their plans to Mayor Matthews.

Herman Ridder presided. He introduced ex-Mayor W. R. It was all along believed that Mr. Grace almed higher, and wanted to be Governor.

Mr. Grace aimed higher, and wanted to be Governor.

Tammany misgovernment was denounced in red-hot speeches, which were enthusiastically applauded by Messrs. Grace, Francis M. Scott, James J. Daly, Robert Grier Monroe, H. de Forest Baldwin and John J. Quinlan.

This Committee was appointed to form a permanent organization and to establish headquarters: Dr. H. C. Anderson, John H. Scuily, Henry Home, Valentine Behringer, J. J. Daly, John J. Willett, Samuel Strecker, Bernard Grunaure and J. J. Quinlan.

OTHER IMPROVEMENTS.

PROPOSED SUBWAY STATION AT BOYLSTON AND TREMONT STREETS.

Carriages and herdies are but little improvement, for the horse-car blockade extends over the whole city and blocks every approach to the stations. The subway will do away with all that difficulty. Tremont street in the section described will be free from car-tracks and will be open for legitimate traffic of teams, while underneath the cars can make double the speed because of the freedom from blockades and the discontinuance of many of the car stations. Under the subway system there will be two stations on Tremont street between the southern terminus and Scollay Square. One will be at the corner of Tremont and Boylston streets, and the other opposite Temple place, on the cigo of the Common. In the section mentioned there are now ten stopping-places. This marked reduction in the number of stations means a decided increase in speed, which will more than offset the short distance which patrons will have to walk in order to board a train. Then, too, the crossing of tracks at the corner of Tremont and Boylston streets and at the Park Street Church, which is a cause of constant blockades, will be done away with.

FOUR TRACKS UNDERGROUND.

The subway as planned, will contain four tracks from its northern terminuse to the corner of Tremont and Boylston streets. From this point the two eastserly tracks will continue along Tremont street to Pleasant, while the two westserly tracks will continue along Boylston street, as will be described later on.

The four track subway is designed to be in general forty-six feet wide by fifteen high. It will be lined throughout with white-glizzed porcelain tile or brick, and lighted by electricity at all hours.

The construction of the track and roadbed in the subway will be similar to that of the best steam railroads, insuring a smoothness which is impossible on a street track, where the ties and joints are inaccessible. The atmosphere in the subway will be warmer in the winter and cooler in the summer than on the surface, and without the sudden changes so common is this climate.

Artificial ventilation will be provided by immense fans or blowers, and pipes in the New York elevated system. The descent to these platforms will be about sixteen feet, or two-thirds the height of many of the New York elevated stations. The

He thought the pretty glass booths which he saw on the curbs there would be an improvement on the ramshackle structures to be seen here, and believing that he could get the privilege of erecting them under "L' stairways, where they would not be an obstruction, he organized the company and had the bill introduced.

THE ELEVATED ROAD.

The city officials expect that some private corporation will undertake the building of the elevated railway structure to connect with the subway. It is doubtful, though, if any private corporation will undertake any such expensive scheme without aid from the city. Once out of the business district, the avenues leading to the suburbs are broad enough to afford room for an elevated structure with but little expense in the way of hand damages.

But Boston and New York differ widely geographically and topographically. In New York the tide of travel is necessarily in one general direction in the morning, with a return in the opposite direction at night. Boston is a verifable "hub." The streets leading to the various suburbs are like the spokes of a wheel.

No one line of clevated railway would wheel. No one line of clevated railway would command enough traffic to begin to pay the interest on the debt incurred in the building of the system. In the morning the people flock to the city from a score of points of the compass, and at night they scatter as widely. An elevated railway structure would be a losing ventury in Boston unless the city was behind it financially.
